Social structure is one of the most central concepts in sociology. Yet there is wide disagreement about what it means. This disagreement is consequential because differences in the way sociologists conceptualize social structure lead to very different approaches to sociology. The purpose of this paper is two- fold.

A status, argued Linton (1936: p. 113) is a slot in social structure, or as he said (he used the idea of social "systems," not "structures"), "a position in a particular pattern." Such a position has both rights and duties associated with it, and action in accordance with these is the performance of a role.
